In the animal organism, an organ having for its function the separation or elaboration of some particular substance or substances from the blood, either (as in excretion) for mere elimination or (as in secretion) to serve a physiological purpose within the organism or, as in the case of the testicles, the mammary g's, and poison-g's, a special purpose in another organism. A g. may be either a simple cellular sac or crypt or a collection of such structures together with a connective-tissue framework, nerves, blood-vessels, ducts, etc., inclosed in a capsule. [L, 206.] 3. An organ which, while it has (like the testicles and the ovaries) or has not the functions mentioned, is or has been supposed to exert a physiological action upon the blood passing through it, or to take part in the formation of the blood, or in some way to affect the character of the organism. Such g's are the thymus, the thyroid, and the spleen. 4. An organ having the general appearance of a g., but not assumed to have glandular functions (e. g., the pineal g.). 5. A lymphatic nodule; a collection of specially arranged lymphoid tissue in the course of a lymphatic vessel. It is believed that no lymph reaches the blood-vessels without having traversed one or more lymphatic g's. The g's vary from a few mm. to several cm. in diameter. Their number in man is estimated to be between 500 and 600, but they are less numerous in most animals; many are solitary, but oftener they are in groups or chains, forming, with the lymphatic vessels, the so-called lymphatic plexuses. They are in most cases near blood-vessels, and, for the avoidance of undue pressure, loosely connected to the surrounding tissues. In the limbs, pressure is further avoided by their situation, which is mostly in the flexures of the joints. The afferent trunks usually divide into several small vessels before entering the g. The efferent trunk is usually the larger and less divided. Lymphatic g's are well supplied with blood-vessels, which ramify in the medullary cords or proper lymphoid tissue bordering the lymph path. In some cases the blood-vessels and efferent lymphatics enter and leave the g. at a small depression, which, in analogy with the kidney, has been called the hilum, but this depression is frequently absent and rarely a marked feature. [J, 30, 55, 71, 79].—Mammary g's. Lat., glandulae mammales (seu lactiferae). Fr., glandes mammaires. Ger., Brustdrüsen, Saugdrüsen, Milchdrüsen, Briesel. It., glandole mammarie (o di latte). Sp., glándulas mamarias. G's accessory to the generative system, which secrete milk, and are characteristic of the class of vertebrata known as Mammalia. The g. structure is composed of lobes, lobules, and acini, which constitute the secretory apparatus. The acini consist of clusters of rounded vesicles, which form the commencement of canaliculi. These unite to form the canals of the lobules, and these by their anastomoses form the lactiferous ducts, which are from 15 to 20

The lobes are bound together by fibrous or areolar tissue, and their interspaces are filled with adipose tissue. They are about thirty in number in the upper lid, and somewhat fewer in the lower. They correspond in length with the breadth of each tarsus. Their ducts open on the free margin of the lids by minute foramina. These g's are a variety of the cutaneous sebaceous g's, each consisting of a single straight tube or follicle, having a blind termination into which a number of small secondary follicles open. They are lined by a mucous membrane covered by squamous epithelium. They secrete a sebaceous material which prevents adhesion of the lids. [F.]—Méry's g's. Fr., glandes de Méry.

GLANDERS, n. sing. *Gla*³*ndu*³-*u*³*rz*. Gr., μάλας. Lat., maleus, equina glandulosa. Fr., morve. Ger., Rotz. It., cimurro. Sp., muermo. A contagious, malignant disease of the horse, ass, and mule, occasionally transmitted to man; characterized by inflammation and ulceration of the nasal mucous membrane and swelling of the neighboring lymphatic glands (whence the name). [D, 1; E.] Cf. Farcy.—Acute g. Fr., morve aiguë. In this disease the period of incubation is uncertain; the first symptom is a nasal catarrh, usually unilateral. The discharge, clear at first, becomes turbid, sanguineous, and purulent, and is expelled in solid masses; the nasal mucous membrane is swollen, and ulcers and tubercles appear on its surface. There is marked febrile disturbance, with prostration. There are lymphangitis, lymphadenitis, and oedematous swelling of the extremities, the lower portion of the abdomen, and the breast. With the extension of the specific inflammation to the mucous membrane of the larynx and bronchi, there are cough and other symptoms of laryngeal irritation, and a physical examination of the chest reveals bronchitis or pneumonia. A bacteriological examination shows the presence of the Bacillus mallei. The animal rapidly loses flesh, and death ensues in from eight to twenty-one days. In man, the initial symptoms are malaise, prostration, chills, and pain in the head, muscles, and joints. Fever, either remittent or continued, appears, the appetite fails, there is gastric disturbance, and eventually there is a papular eruption; the papules rapidly suppurate, forming crater-like ulcers covered with a white deposit, and discharging thick mucopurulent matter. Similar lesions may form on the mucous membranes, in the muscular tissue, and elsewhere, and the lymphatic vessels and nodules become indurated and enlarged. Respiratory complications often ensue. There are great prostration, delirium, and stupor, and death from collapse may result. Usually there is a definite history of contagion; lacking this, bacteriological methods will decide the character of the disease, the clinical features of which vary with the extent of the local deposit of the Bacillus mallei and the pro-maine formation. [L, 20 (a, 34).]—Chronic g. Fr., morve chronique. G. that persists for months or years, but little constitutional disturbance being excited. Cicatrization may take place in the ulcers on the mucous membrane, and calcification or fibroid degeneration occur in the tubercles. Hard and painful nodules and abscesses appear on the extremities, head, and neck; these suppurate, forming deeply excavated ulcers that discharge a foul, sanguineopurulent matter. The connective tissue surrounding these "farcy sores" is swollen and indurated, and the neighboring lymphatic vessels and glands are affected in like manner. Emaciation progresses more or less slowly, and death from exhaustion eventually occurs. In the human subject, the initial symptoms are the same as in acute human g. The external cutaneous ulcers develop more slowly, and the mucous membranes may escape or be but slightly affected. The ulcers eventually cicatrize and the gastric and respiratory symptoms disappear, but the patient rallies slowly and is liable to a recurrence of the active symptoms. [L, 20 (a, 34).]—Diffuse g. Of Röhl, g. in which there is a diffused deposit of round cellular elements in the cavities and interstices of the connective tissue; there are ulcers of the mucous and cutaneous surfaces that are of a cloudy or grayish-white color, and present an eroded appearance. The ulcers heal slowly, forming indurated cicatrices, the disease appearing in some other part of the organism. [L, 20 (a, 34).]—Latent g. Fr., morve latente. G. in the horse in which the active processes of the disease temporarily cease, but eventually reappear and proceed to a fatal issue. ["Jour. of Comp. Med. and Surg.," (a, 34).]—Pulmonary g. A form of g. in which the animal loses flesh, sweating on the least exertion, diarrhoea is easily induced, there is paroxysmal glycosuria, the appetite is capricious, the hair is easily removed from the mane and tail, and there is a persistent dry, dull, soft cough. The animal may remain in this condition for weeks or months, eventually dying of marasmus, or all the active symptoms of g. may appear. A post-mortem examination will reveal the lungs studded with nodules varying in size from that of a mustard-seed to that of a pigeon's egg, and the deep lymphatic glands may be affected. [a, 34.]

GLIOSIS (Lat.), n. f. Gli¹(gle)-os¹'s. Gen., -os¹'eos(-is). Fr., gliose. Ger., Gliose. A cerebral disease characterized anatomically by sclerosed or cirrhotic foci in the gray matter, with the formation of lacunar spaces. The sclerosed foci have a predilection for the central and three frontal convolutions, the opercula, and the insula. They are excavated at the centre, and there is a granular degeneration of the connective tissue. Occasionally in such cases there are atrophy of the optic nerves and olfactory bulbs and degeneration of the posterior column of the spinal cord. There is usually a neurotic ancestry, and the disease not infrequently begins in childhood. Some observers have thought it consequent upon a leptomeningitis. It is difficult to diagnose from general paralysis, but may be distinguished from diffuse sclerosis by the absence of trembling, nystagmus, and hesitating speech. [a, 34.]

Lat., vesicula directrix. Fr., vesicule directrice, corpuscule exéreté (ou hyalin), cellule antipode, g. polaire (ou salaire, ou muqueux, ou huileux, ou transparent). Ger., Richtungsbilse, Richtungsbläschen, Richtungskörper, Richtungskörperchen, Polarkörperchen, Polzeile, Polkörner. It., globulo polare. Syn.: apoblast, areal corpuscle, preseminal outcast cell, directing (or directive) body (or corpuscle, or g.), polar body (or cell, or vesicle, or g.). A minute, globular or rounded, transparent mass, consisting of a part of the germinal vesicle and a small amount of vitellus that is extruded or expelled from a maturing ovum into the lacuna (in nearly every case before impregnation), and lying within the zona pellucida, near the segmentation spheres, in the early stage of the process of total segmentation of the vitellus. This body is of the morphological value of a cell, and may subdivide after extrusion. In most cases the part of the germinal vesicle remaining in the ovum again divides, and a second polar body or g. is extruded, making normally three in all. These remain between the ovum and the vitelline membrane, and, so far as known, take no part in the formation of the embryo; they finally disappear, and in some rare cases have been observed to be reabsorbed into the vitellus. The part of the germinal vesicle not extruded becomes the female pronucleus (g. v.). The extrusion g's were first observed by Carus, in 1828, and Dumortier ["Ann. des sci. nat.," 1837]. They have since been observed in many invertebrates, including some of those characterized by parthenogenetic reproduction, and in two mammals, the rabbit and the bat. Their significance is not understood. They were supposed by F. Müller to determine the direction of the cleavage, hence his name (vesiculae directrices, Richtungsbiläschen). Köllin supposed that the point of extrusion was necessarily the beginning point of segmentation, whence his name (g's polaires). It is suggested by some authors that the polar or extrusion g's are the male part of the ova, which are, on this hypothesis, hermaphroditic [Minot]; by others the phenomenon is looked upon as an effort at segmentation before fertilization [Whitman]; and by Weismann it is thought that the extrusion g's represent the histogenetic or somatic plasma of the ovum, which must be removed in order to leave the germ-plasma free to act. A substance, $\text{C}_6\text{H}_{12}\text{O}_6 = \begin{matrix} \text{C}_6\text{H}_6(\text{OH})_6 \\ \text{CH}_2 \end{matrix}$, belonging to the class of carbohydrates occurring in the juices of most sweet fruits, in honey, and, in minute proportions, in the healthy animal organism, in the blood, liver, heart, thymus gland, lungs, bile, and urine. Its presence in the latter fluids is denied by some (and by more recent) observers, but acknowledged by others. In certain pathological conditions (e. g., diabetes mellitus) it is found in considerable quantity in the blood and urine (constituting glycosuria), and may also be present in other secretions and excretions of the body. It is also produced by the action of ferments or of chemical agents on other members of the carbohydrate group (cane-sugar, starch, cellulose, etc.) and on glucosides. It occurs under the form either of granular masses containing 1 molecule of water of crystallization, $\text{C}_6\text{H}_{12}\text{O}_6 + \text{H}_2\text{O}$, or of anhydrous acicular or prismatic crystals, forming warty conglomerations. It has a sweet taste, less pronounced than that of cane-sugar. It is readily soluble in water, less soluble in alcohol. Its aqueous solution, when freshly prepared from the crystals and when cold, has a specific dextrorotatory power of 104°; but when heated, or after standing a long time, or when occurring naturally in solution, as in the urine, it has a specific rotary power of 56° (52.85° [B, 9]). In chemical structure it is at once a pentatomic alcohol and an aldehyde of the hexatomic alcohol mannite. 2. GLYCERIN, n. $\text{Gli}^2\text{(glu}^2\text{'k)}^2\text{-e}^2\text{-r}^2\text{'i}^2\text{n}$. Lat., glycerinum [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Ger. Ph., etc.], glycerina [Belg. Ph.] (from $\gamma\lambda\upsilon\kappa\upsilon\varsigma$, sweet). Fr., glycérine, glycérine officinale [Fr. Cod.]. Ger., Glyzerin, Oelzucker. It., Sp., glicérina [Sp. Ph.]. The name given to a series of triatomic alcohols derived from the paraffins, (C_nH_{2n+2}) , by the substitution of 3 molecules of (OH) for 3 atoms of O. Their formula is, accordingly, $C_nH_{2n-1}(OH)_3$. There are but two members of the series known: propenyl g., or propenyl alcohol, $C_3H_5(OH)_3$, and quintenyl g., or quitenyl (or pentenyl) alcohol, $C_5H_9(OH)_3$. The latter, called also amyly g., is a thick, colorless liquid, having a sweet, aromatic taste. The former is common g., a sweet, viscid, colorless, odorless liquid of sp. gr. 1.267 and boiling at $240^\circ C.$, obtained in the saponification of fats, also called glycerol. As derived from glyceryl, it has the formula $CH_2OH-CHOH-CH_2OH$, and so is not, properly speaking, propenyl alcohol, in which case it would have the formula $CH_3-CH(OH)CH(OH)_2$. It has considerable solvent power and forms a series of compounds, the glycerides or glycerites. Pure g. has a great affinity for water, and, by reason of this property, it is used in chemistry as a desiccant and in medicine as a derivative (chiefly by means of wads of absorbent cotton saturated with it and inserted in the vagina, which act by causing a watery discharge in cases of chronic pelvic inflammations) and as a purgative (in the form of rectal suppositories). On account of the same property, it is largely used in pharmacy as an ingredient of preparations that would be injured by becoming hard and dry. Undiluted, it is a mild irritant; properly diluted, it is a cleansing and emollient application. Taken by the stomach, it is laxative, antizymotic, and nutritive, and in large doses a stimulant. G. is official in all pharmacopœias. It always contains a little water, which should not exceed 5 per cent. [U. S. Ph.] [B. 2, 81.]—Absolute g. G. absolutely free from water. [B.]—Amyly g. Ger., Amylg. See QUINTENYL alcohol.—Creasoted g. Fr., glycérine créosotée. Of Guibert, a preparation composed of 125 grammes of g. and 12 drops of creasote. [B. 38.]—Distilled g. Syn.: Price's g. Of Wilson and Payne, a pure g. obtained by passing a current of steam at 100° to $110^\circ C.$ through g. which has been concentrated at as low a temperature as possible to a sp. gr. of 1.15. The temperature of the steam is subsequently raised to 170° to $180^\circ C.$, and the vapors of g. and water are collected in a series of condensers. [B. 3 (a, 27).]—G. bath. Ger., G'bad. See under BATH.—G'disulphonic acid. Ger., G'disulfonsäure. A carbohydrate discovered by Claude Bernard, having the same percentage composition as starch, $(n \cdot C_6H_{10}O_5)_n$, occurring in the liver, especially during and after digestion, in muscular tissue, the brain and testes, in the placenta, and in great abundance in the embryonic tissues, especially in the early stages of development before the liver is formed, and in the yolks and white of eggs, also in new cartilage-cells and in leucocytes. It is said to be present in the spleen, pancreas, and kidney. It is a white, amorphous, odorless and tasteless powder; forms an opalescent solution with water, the opalescence disappearing on the addition of an alkali; strikes a port-wine color with iodine; and in aqueous solution is strongly dextrorotatory. It is converted by dilute acids and by amyolytic ferments into one or more carbohydrates, and this change is continually taking place in the body. According to the older views, the product of this action is glucose; but, according to Musculus and V. Mering, the chief products are maltose and achroodextrin, the former being thereafter converted into glucose. According to others, the final product is not glucose but ferment-sugar. See GLYCYRRHIZIN.—G. ammoniacale, G. ammoniatum [U. S. Ph.]. Fr. glycyrrhizine ammoniacale [Fr. Cod.], glyzine [Fr. Cod.]. A preparation made by moistening 100 parts of glycyrrhiza with water containing 5 per cent. of aqua ammonia, and, after macerating for 24 hours, packing in a percolator, and gradually adding water until 500 parts of percolate are obtained; then adding sulphuric acid slowly and with continuous stirring, as long as a precipitate is obtained, collecting the latter on a strainer, washing it with cold water, redissolving with ammoniated water, and precipitating again by sulphuric acid as before. This last precipitate, after being washed, is again dissolved in ammoniated water and spread on glass plates, where, on drying, the product is obtained in scales [U. S. Ph.]. According to the Fr. Cod., 200 parts of contused glycyrrhiza are macerated in 400 of water, expressed, and the residue treated again with 400 parts of water, and the two liquids boiled and filtered to separate the coagulated albumen; the filtered fluid is precipitated with 3 parts of diluted sulphuric acid, and the precipitate is washed and dissolved in a mixture of 4 of aqua ammonia and dried on glass plates at 40° C. The dark-brown or brownish-red scales thus obtained are inodorous, of a very sweet taste, are soluble in water and diluted alcohol, and consist mainly of neutral ammonium glycyrrhizate, $\text{C}_{44}\text{H}_{82}(\text{NH}_4)\text{NO}_{18}$, and a variable quantity of glycyrrhamycin. GOLD, n. Gold. Gr., χρυσός. Lat., aurum [Gr. Ph., Netherl. Ph.], Fr., or [Fr. Cod.], Ger., G. It., Sp., oro [Sp. Ph.]. 1. A metallic element known from the earliest times. It is found in nature in the combined and the free state, in the latter case being usually associated with silver, also with other metals. It is a soft, bright-yellow, lustrous substance, and is exceedingly tenacious, malleable, and ductile. It is very heavy, having a sp. gr. of 19.265. It is not oxidized at any temperature by contact with water or oxygen, and is not attacked by any acids except selenic acid and a mixture, which, like nitro-hydrochloric acid, contains nascent chlorine. It is also attacked by alkalis. G. often occurs in nature in small grains and crystals, sometimes aggregated into filamentous masses. These forms may be reproduced artificially. When in fine subdivision, g. is a light-brownish powder (auri pulveris). G. in composition acts as a monad, forming aurous compounds, and as a triad, forming auric compounds. Symbol, Au (from aurum); atomic weight, 196.2. It is employed in medicine in the form of g. leaf and of g. ashes, and also as the base of various salts (see the subheads), as an alterative, aphrodisiac, antisyphilitic, and antiscorbatic, and in urinary diseases, phthisis, etc. G. leaf is usually eaten with betel leaf. An acute or chronic diathetic disease, manifested by localized inflammation with intense pain in the former and often without either of these symptoms in the latter division. It may be inherited or acquired; the digestive system is largely involved, the attacks being associated with an increase of uric acid in the organism and usually with a deposit of urate of sodium (tophi) on the articular cartilages and in fibrous structures. The nervous system is also involved, but it is not yet decided whether primarily or secondarily. This excess of uric acid in the blood may begin after excessive gormandizing, the plentiful use of wines, fatigue, worry, defective excretion, or exposure. G. wood is hard and heavy, bitterish, and somewhat pungent, and emits an agreeable odor when burned. Medicinally it is a stimulant diaphoretic, and is used to palliate the symptoms of syphilis or to assist the operation of more efficient remedies. It has also been recommended in chronic rheumatism and gout, scrofula, and other chronic diseases dependent on a vitiated condition of the system, and in acute amygdalitis and pharyngitis. It is usually used in decoction. [B, 95; B, 5, 19, 180 (α, 24)].—G. yellow. Ger., Guajakgelb. The coloring matter of g. resin, forming pale-yellow, octahedral crystals of a bitter taste. GUM, n. Gu²m. Gr., κόμμι (1st def.), ὄλον (3d def.). Lat., gummi (1st def.), gingiva (3d def.). Fr., gomme (1st def.), gencive (3d def.). Ger., Gummi (1st def.), Zahnfleisch (3d def.). It., gomma (1st def.), gingiva (3d def.). Sp., goma (1st def.), encia (3d def.). 1. A thick, viscid, tenacious exudation from the stems, branches, or fruits of plants, which hardens on exposure to the air into a transparent, amorphous, vitreous mass, is converted into glucose by dilute sulphuric acid, is insoluble in alcohol, and is distinguished from a resin by being soluble in water, forming with it a mucilage, or at least being softened by it (cf. G. resin). It is produced from vegetable cells by the solution and rupture of the cell-wall, and the discharge, coalescence, and subsequent hardening of the cell-contents. This initiatory rupture is probably secondary to a degeneration in the cellulose of which the cell-wall is composed (g.-disease of plants), and has been thought due to the presence of a bacterium. Chemically, the g's are complex compounds of various metallic elements with one or more proximate principles (often improperly termed g's) analogous in structure to the carbohydrates, being probably diglycosic alcohols (arabin, bassorin, and cerasin). G. is used in medicine, chiefly as a demulcent, an excipient, or as a menstruum in which to suspend insoluble drugs. In the arts it is employed as an adhesive paste (see PASTA GUMMOSA) and to stiffen and give lustre to fabrics. For the individual g's not here mentioned, see the major list. 2. Caoutchouc; used in this sense especially in composition. [B, 4, 5; B, 77 (a, 24).] 3. The tissue overlying the alveolar processes of the maxillary bones (to the periosteum of which it is closely adherent) and surrounding the bases of the teeth. It consists of dense fibrous tissue covered by a vascular but almost insensitive mucous membrane, presenting around the necks of the teeth numerous fine papillæ. [A, 478 (a, 17).]—Acaroid g. See

It occurs in irregular pieces, tough, brown or yellow in color, inodorous, tasteless, and but little soluble in water, containing but 1 per cent. of arabin and larger amounts of bassorin. The insoluble portion is bassorin, and renders the g. useless. It is often used to adulterate g. tragacanth, and is then called caramania g. (q. v.). Soc.," 1869, p. 479), who, however, referred to more than is generally embraced under it. Important motor areas are located in the sigmoid g., and its cephalic and caudal arms are sometimes distinguished as the præcruciate and postcruciate gyri. Ger., oberster G. frontalis. Of Owen, the g. along the margin of the cerebrum between the precentral fissure and the orbital surface; of Wilder, the same, including the corresponding area on the mesal aspect; the marginal g. of Owen. A term used very differently by different writers, so as to include either (1) the uncus and a corresponding part of the hippocampal g., or (2) the hippocampal and the uncinate gyri as above limited, or, (3) in addition, the subcalcarine g. Not to be confounded with Valentin's gyri unciniformes. [I, 7, 38; Clevenger, "Jour. of Nerv. and Ment. Dis.," 1879 (I).] See also Uncinate convolution.—Unter g. frontalis (Ger.). An instrument, devised by Chauveau and perfected by Lortet, for determining the velocity and fluctuations in velocity of the blood-current. It consists of a short tube which can be put between the divided ends of a blood-vessel so that the current shall traverse it. Into the tube projects the short arm of a lever. The long arm, projecting from the tube, acts as an indicator on a divided semicircle. The flowing of the stream deflects the index, and the amount of the deflection indicates the rapidity. This may be read off on the divided circle, which has been graduated by using the instrument for currents of known velocity. Other tubes connecting with the instrument join a manometer and a sphygmoscope, so that the pressure and the pulse curves may be taken at the same time. [J, 57, 124.]

HEART, n. He²rt. A-S., heorte. Gr., καρδιά. Lat., cor. Fr., cœur. Ger., Herz. It., cuore. Sp., corazón. 1. The pulsating organ which propels the blood through the vascular system of all

bers, each provided with a set of valves. In the Annelida it is a long pulsating tube, usually placed in the longitudinal axis of the body, and in the Annulosa is shortened and more or less curved upon itself. In insects there is a contractile articulated dorsal vessel, into which the blood enters through lateral openings, to be forced out of the anterior extremity of the whole structure. In Mollusca it consists of a two-chambered organ, the blood being received into an auricle, occasionally divided into two, and distributed by a ventricle. In ascidians the contractions of the tubular h. occur alternately at one end and then at the other, so that the blood is propelled rhythmically in two opposite directions. In none of the invertebrates is the circulatory apparatus a closed system, a portion of the blood being discharged into sinuses or cavities, from which it is returned to the h. In vertebrates the vascular system consists of a series of closed tubes and a h., within which the blood is always contained, and, with a few exceptions, there are no auxiliary pulsating segments (accessory h's) of the blood-vessels. In Amphioxus the h. is represented by a contractile trunk along the lower surface of the pharynx, from which lateral branches ascend. In fishes the h. is two-chambered, and differs from that of other vertebrates in that it does not contain arterial, but venous blood, which it receives from the veins and forces through the gills to be aerated. In Amphibia and most reptiles there are one ventricle and two auricles, the right one of which receives venous blood, which it forces in part through the lungs into the left auricle. Both auricles discharge their contents into the ventricle, which connects with both the pulmonary and the systemic circulations, so that there is a constant admixture of arterial and venous blood. In certain reptiles the ventricle is divided into two cavities, by an incomplete septum. In the crocodiles this septum is complete, but there is a communication between the pulmonary artery and the aorta, allowing of a mixing of the arterial and venous blood. In all warm-blooded vertebrates the h. is a hollow viscus consisting of four cavities, a right and left auricle and a right and left ventricle, and is always associated with a pulmonary circulation. In man it is somewhat conical in shape, and inclosed in the cavity of the pericardium. Its base is directed upward, backward, and to the right, its situation corresponding to the space between the fifth and eighth dorsal vertebrae. It is held in position by the aorta, pulmonary artery, and venæ cavae. The apex is free, and its impulse is felt a little below and to the inner side of the left nipple. The upper border corresponds to a line drawn across the sternum on a level with the upper border of the cartilage of the third rib, and the lower border to a line drawn between the point where the apex-beat is felt to the right costo-xiphoid articulation. It is about 5 inches in length, 3/4 wide at its broadest part, and 2/4 in thickness; it weighs from 10 to 12 oz. in the male and from 8 to 10 oz. in the female, and, with the exception of about a third of its bulk, lies to the left of the median line of the chest. It is divided by longitudinal and a transverse septum into four chambers, the two auricles and two ventricles. The position of these septa is indicated by the auriculo-ventricular and longitudinal grooves. The muscular tissue is of the involuntary variety, and is arranged differently in the auricles and ventricles. In the auricles the fibres consist of a superficial transverse layer, a deeper layer of looped fibres, which pass over each auricle and are attached at each end to the fibrous rings surrounding the auriculo-ventricular openings, and annular fibres which surround the appendices of the auricle, and are continued upon the venæ cavae and pulmonary veins on either side. The ventricular fibres consist of a superficial set, which are arranged longitudinally, obliquely, and spirally, and a deep circular set. The spiral fibres start from the base and pass obliquely from right to left and from above downward on the anterior surface of the ventricles, and from left to right and somewhat obliquely on the surface, toward the apex, where they curve around its axis and pass inward to form the interventricular septum, the inner surface of the ventricles, and the muscoli papillares, and are inserted vertebrates and the higher invertebrates. In its simplest form it consists of a specialized pulsating portion of the vascular system, and in its most complex form of an organ with four distinct cham-directly into the fibrous rings of the auriculo-ventricular openings or mediately through the chordæ tendinæ. Some of these fibres do not reach the apex, but pass directly into the septum, surrounding each ventricle separately. The circular fibres surround each ventricle separately or together, and are inserted into the rings surrounding the orifices at the base of the h. The arterial supply is derived from the anterior and posterior coronary arteries, and side of the heart, corresponding to the septum, the trace of which persists in adult life as the interventricular groove. The anterior portion of the tubular h. is divided to form the origin of the aorta and of the pulmonary artery. Above this division these vessels are united by the ductus arteriosus. The posterior portion is also divided to form the auricle, but the partition is incomplete until birth, having an opening known as the foramen ovale, which is partially

Ger. Fötalherz. The h. as it exists in the fœtus. In its earliest condition the h. of a mammal consists of two tubes, one on each side of the body, formed in the visceral layer of the mesoblast. These soon coalesce in the median line and form a central tube, which receives two veins from below, and gives off an arterial trunk from its upper extremity. This tube becomes elongated, bent so that its middle portion projects forward and to the right and twisted on itself. It is then divided by two transverse constrictions into three parts. In the middle one of these divisions a partition rises from the lower part of the right wall and gradually grows until it forms a complete separation of the two rudimentary ventricular cavities. At the same time a cleft appears on the out-closed during the latter part of fœtal life by a valve, which gradually becomes adherent to the interauricular septum. The attitude of the fœtal h. is vertical until the fourth month, when it begins to assume an oblique attitude. Its proportionate size as compared with the body is very great during the early months, and decreases toward the time of birth. During early fœtal life the auricular portion is larger than the ventricular, and the ventricular walls are about equal in thickness; but toward the time of birth the ventricular portion becomes the larger, and the thickness of the left ventricle is much increased. Ger., Histogenese, Histogenese. The origin and development of the tissues. While all the tissues originate from an ovum, it is common to attribute their direct origin to the epiblast, hypoblast, or mesoblast. Questions in regard to which tissues are derived from each germ layer, and as to the precise steps taken by the embryonic cells in becoming transformed into the various tissues, are still under discussion. The development of the tissues from the cells of these three layers is, except for the epithelia, a complicated process. [J, 23, 30, 31, 35, 55; Haeckel, "Jena. Zts.," 1884, p. 206; J. Hensinger (1824) (J.)] See DIFFERENTIATION (1st def.) and the various subheads of H.—H. of bone. See OSTEOGENESIS.—H. of cartilage. See CHONDROGENESIS.—H. of connective tissue. A process preceded in the embryo by the presence of mesodermic cells. These at first become somewhat separated, but still remain joined by intervening processes, the space being filled by a clear gelatiniform, intracellular or ground-substance. According to some authors, the bundles of connective tissue arise by the longitudinal division of greatly elongated cells into fibrillae. The untransformed cells remain as the connective-tissue corpuscles. By others the fibres are supposed to be formed by a deposit or condensation of fibrillae in the ground-substance. Ravier describes the elastic tissue as originating from globules of the so-called elastin in the ground substance. If these globules coalesce end-to-end, an elastic fibre is formed, while if they coalesce on all sides, an elastic membrane is formed. [J, 30, 31, 47.]—H. of epithelium. The arrangement of embryonic cells from either germ layer into a continuous covering for some free surface. The cells may form a single layer, as in the alveoli of the lungs, or there may be several layers, as in the stratified epithelia; or the form may become cylindrical or flattened. In character the cells may become horny, as in the hair and nails, or, while the cells remain active, the activity may be entirely subservient to some very special object, as in the sensory, glandular, and ciliated epithelia. [J, 30, 31, 35.]—H. of muscular tissue. 1. In the development of a striated muscular fibre, a process in which a mesodermic cell assumes an elongated spindle-shape and increases in size, while its nucleus repeatedly divides. The circumference of the cell then becomes longitudinally striated, forming a kind of mantle, the central part being composed of many nuclei and a granular glycogen-holding protoplasm. In the course of development the entire mass of the elongated cell becomes striated, at first longitudinally, and then transversely. The origin of the sarcolemma is still in doubt. 2. In the development of an unstriated muscular fibre (see Muscular-fibre CELL), a process in which a granular mesodermic cell becomes elongated and spindle-shaped, the nucleus elongates but does not commonly divide, the entire cell increases considerably in size, and, while the nucleus retains its granular aspect, the cell-body becomes more homogeneous in structure, and the entire cell assumes the characteristic appearance and properties of a contractile fibre-cell. [J, 30, 35, 55.]—H. of nervous tissue. Nervous tissue is mostly if not entirely derived from the ectoblast. The nerve-cells are transformed ectodermic cells, and the axis-cylinder of the nerves is probably a continuous outgrowth of a process of a nerve-cell. It is described by some, however, as being formed by a coalescence of elongated cells in linear series. The medullated sheath and the primitive sheath are supposed to be of mesodermic origin, and so of the supporting tissue or neuroglia of the brain and myelin. From its chemical reactions, the neuroglia seems allied to horn, and hence it is suggested by Kühne and Ewald to be of ectodermic origin. ["Jena. Ztsch.," 1884, p. 206 (J, 30, 31, 55, 60).]—H. of the blood. See HÆMATOGENESIS.

When recently prepared, it is an amorphous substance of agreeable odor and very sweet taste, varying in color from white or yellowish-white to brown, and in consistence from a viscid liquid to a soft solid. It is readily soluble in water. In chemical structure it is a mixture of levulose and glucose (dextrose 70 to 80 per cent.), with a varying proportion of water (30 to 30 per cent.) and traces of organic and mineral constituents. It is a detergent, pectoral, emollient, demulcent, laxative, and nutrient. Locally applied, it stimulates atonic mucous surfaces. A paste made of h. and flour is used to promote the maturation of abscesses and buboes. As an emollient it is employed as a vehicle, as a gargle to cure apthae, and as an application to the throat in various inflamed states, also as an application to sore nipples and to swollen mammae for checking the secretion of milk. New h. is regarded as a laxative and demulcent; old h. as an astringent and demulcent. In India it is used with Chuna as an external application to the temples in headache, to the abdomen or around the navel in colic, and to bruises and sprains.
